Reading a poetry book

Books of poetry tell small stories from a children's world of imagination, emotion and experience. You can choose in which order to read the poems or not even read all of them. You can choose to read a poem because of an intriguing illustration, an interesting title, or because it suited your mood. You can decide to read just one poem at a time, or skip ahead. You may enjoy discussing the poem: Did you like it and why?

Pleased to meet you — Nahum Gutman

He painted Israel in bright colors and told children's stories in words and illustrations. If you scan the QR code, you will be able to discover Nahum Gutman's books and paintings, and take a virtual tour of the Nahum Gutman Museum in Tel Aviv.

מִשְׂחָק

A game of "Which Poem am I?"

Take turns with your family selecting a poem and acting it out without speaking. The other players will try to guess which poem it is. You can also choose one that you all like, and act it out together, or read it out loud while adding matching dance moves.

Paint and tell

There are blank pages at the end of the book which you can use to make your own illustrations and then write stories just like artist Nahum Gutman and authoress Mira Meir did. Perhaps you and your family would enjoy writing a whole series!
