Discussion — Parents ask "why?"
What sort of questions would you like to ask, and of whom? This may be an opportunity for both parents and children to share the questions that interest them the most. You could also raise questions that you would have liked to ask Shu the Vixen and Tut the Snail.

Being creative — The question box
What can we do with all the questions waiting to be answered? How about preparing a special question box, decorating it, and filling it with all the questions you find so intriguing. You could write them down on some notepaper and put them into the question box. Anytime you like, pick one, and look for the answer together.

Question games

Why at home? – Go around the house collecting "why?" questions about everything you encounter.

Questions about friendship – inspired by Tut and Shu's friendship, you may enjoy asking: What do you think about Shu's friends' behavior? Has a friend of yours ever gone far away, or have you ever left a friend behind? Who were your parents' friends when they were younger? What did they play or like to do together? What does your child like to do when their friends are around?

Questions about pictures – You may want to look at a picture together, and try to think of as many questions as you can to ask about it. You could then go out searching for the answers to your intriguing questions. You may even enjoy challenging yourselves, and looking for questions to an answer you already know: look at the picture (for instance: a gift, blue, moon), and instruct your child to think of a question to which this detail in the picture is the answer.
