Proposed Family Activities:

1. You may want to read the book over together several times. You could stop on each page and ask your child: "What will George do?". Your child could repeat the phrase "Oh no, George!" out loud.

2. Perhaps you may enjoy using a stuffed animal or making a simple puppet with which to act the story out together. You could walk around the house with it, looking for various "temptations". What will your stuffed animal or puppet do in each room? How will it behave? Will it manage to restrain itself?

3. You may like to leaf through the book together, looking for various items in the illustrations, such as the cake, cat, or flowers. How many times does each of them appear in the story?

4. This story describes George's contention with the things he is not allowed to do. But surely George does some things he is allowed to do as well! You may want to think together of some of the good things George likes to do, and invent your own story, entitled Oh yes, George!

5. The book ends with the question: "What will George do?". Perhaps you might like to tack on a different ending to the story together.
